

Citing Your Sources Using Chicago (Turabian) Style for Papers

Giving credit to the sources you reference in your paper is not only about compliance with copyright laws, but it's also a critical part of building credibility and trust with your client. Using Chicago (also known as Turabian) Style, the list below demonstrates the proper formats for citing popular business research sources in your paper. Alternatively, you can use Zbib to generate citations for your bibliography. Just make sure you select the Turabian style from the dropdown menu.

Bibliography = Located at the end of your paper, the bibliography is a list of all the sources that you used to inform your work. Items should be listed alphabetically.

Footnote = When you are presenting information in your paper that can be tied back to your research, you should insert footnote with the citation. Note that the format you will use the first time you reference a source is different from subsequent footnotes, which can be abbreviated. Be sure to include the page numbers on which you found the information you are referencing. If there are no page numbers, simply end the footnote with a period.
